

Human Resources

We at Johnson Space Center are proud of our intelligent, well-qualified, and highly motivated workforce. But to keep this workforce and to guarantee we maintain it in the future, we must develop and reward our staff and reach out to future employees. This is the job of the Human Resources Office.

We collaborate with line managers to bring talented people into the Center, deliver services and products that provide for their development and wellbeing, and offer innovative solutions for workforce challenges. We also provide a variety of unique tools designed to improve individual, group, and organizational effectiveness. Helping organizations is rewarding, but facilitating the professional growth of managers and employees is a great feeling in its own right.

We partner with other organizations to address their needs, solve problems, and come up with creative ways to get the job done.

We're also very interested in the people who don't work here – yet. Summer employment programs and the Cooperative Education Program are aimed at recruiting the next generation of Johnson Space Center employees. As a newly hired employee, you could find yourself helping organize and run a program that's designed to bring in even more newly hired employees.

We're not just interested in someone who might come and work for us within a couple of years. We also want to impart the dream of working at NASA to the younger generation through several educational outreach programs. If you work for us, you could be coordinating a program that helps high school students plan an imaginary mission to Mars or the Moon, and then hire them later to work on the real thing.

Typical Degrees Public Administration, Human Resources, Management, and Liberal Arts

Each year, more than 100,000 students and 10,000 educators participate in the Center's educational programs.
